A SHORT-STORY READING LIST

---

RAYMOND W. PENCE

DePauw University

---

Apology is no longer necessary for the short story. Whether for good or evil, it is today the dominating form of literature. This fact affords the teacher of English composition an unusual opportunity, for the short story lends itself readily to the teaching of many principles of effective writing. For one thing, inasmuch as it is a complete unit in small compass, it can be examined from all sides without inconvenience or an unreasonable expenditure of time.

Not only can practically all the principles of narrative writing—and many of the principles of other forms as well—be developed from the short story most conveniently, but they may thus be developed most effectively; for such matters of technique as plot, character delineation, setting, etc., and such matters as style and general literary excellence are far more overtly presented in the short story than in any other form of writing. And it is a commonplace to say that a student comprehends with much greater assurance any item that he can actually put his finger on than he does when the item is presented so subtly that he has to take it on faith.

It is my aim to give a fairly complete list of volumes of short stories that will be of interest, not only to the general reader, but to the teacher in making assignments and in selecting books for a school library. In order that the list may be of the greatest usefulness information has been given as to the publisher, the original copyright date, and the price at which the volume was first issued. Suggestions have been made under each volume title as to the stories in the volume that are of particular value. Further, an attempt has been made to characterize in one word the general nature of the volume. Where the stories making up the volume are of a miscellaneous kind, it has been possible to use only the unsatisfactory word General.

I hope to follow this with a selected list of short stories that are of particular value for plot, for setting, for characterization, etc.
